A Gary Larson of the 1750s? Niels Krog Bredal's Dreamworld

In March 1753, a curious Latin text, titled “ONEIPO-ΚΟΣΜΟΣ. Id est Mundus in Somnio, Poëma Philosophico-Heroicum” [The Dreamworld, a Philosophical-Heroic Poem] appeared in the prestigious Copenhagen weekly, Nye Tidender om Lærde og Curieuse Sager. In a mixture of dactylic hexameters and prose, it deals with a world that the poet has “visited” during his sleep, or rather, in a state of ecstasy, when he was neither asleep nor awake. The hero of the ecstasy suddenly finds himself in a world whose inhabitants speak an unintelligible language. Despite initial complications, he manages to befriend them and study their society as well as the natural history of their planet. Upon waking up, the author interprets his own dream as proof that humanity is not the only lifeform to have souls.

The author, Niels Krog Bredal, was only 19 at the time; the satiric “Dreamworld” was his debut. Replete with irony and self-mockery, it may not be taken too seriously. Nevertheless, like the cartoons of Gary Larson, Bredal’s “Dreamworld” contains grotesque elements that are clearly meant not only to evoke laughter, but also to undermine established ways of thinking about, and dealing with, our fellow beings. It may therefore merit a place in the history of philosophical debates on the superiority of humankind over other species. In my presentation, I will first discuss the “Dream Genre” in early modern literature, then present the contents of Bredal’s text in some detail, and finally analyze it as an example of the “Conte Philosophique”, a genre made popular by the likes of Voltaire.

Models for the Oneiro-Kosmos (Dreamworld)

- Latin language, travels to a foreign world, irony = Ludvig Holberg
- Oneiric Framework = Neo-Latin Menippean satires (Justus Lipsius et al.)
- Great and small beings = Jonathan Swift
- Reflections on the insignificance of man, challenging theological maxims
= Voltaire

Models for the Oneiro-Kosmos (Dreamworld)

First published March 1752

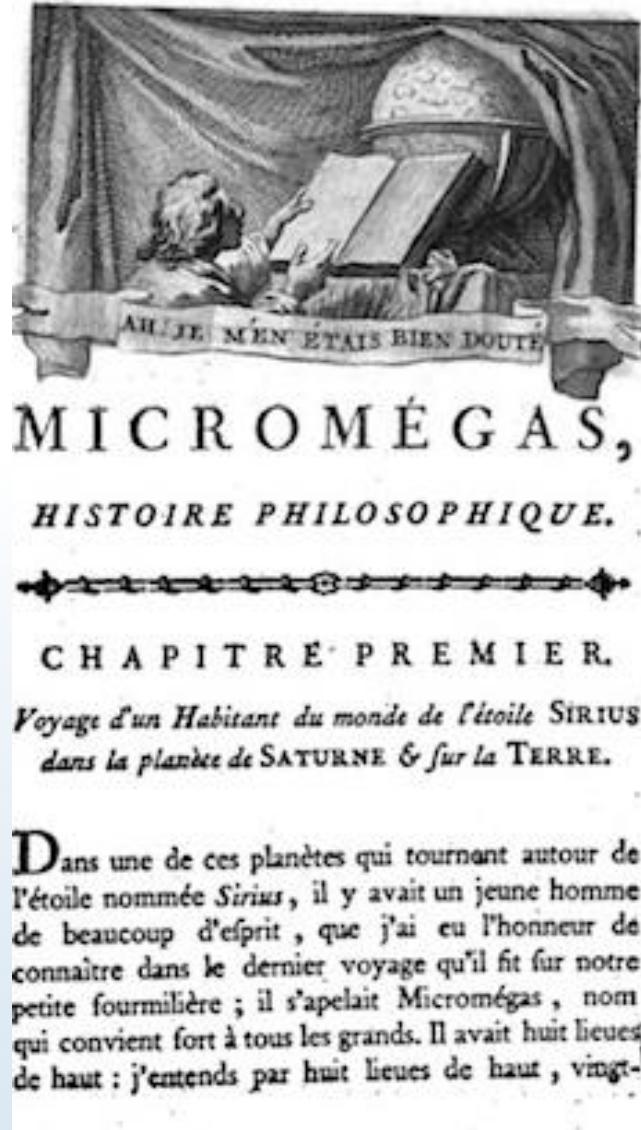

One of Voltaire's main works

Contains play on great and small beings

Giants from space visit Earth; our civilization and hybris becomes a laughing stock

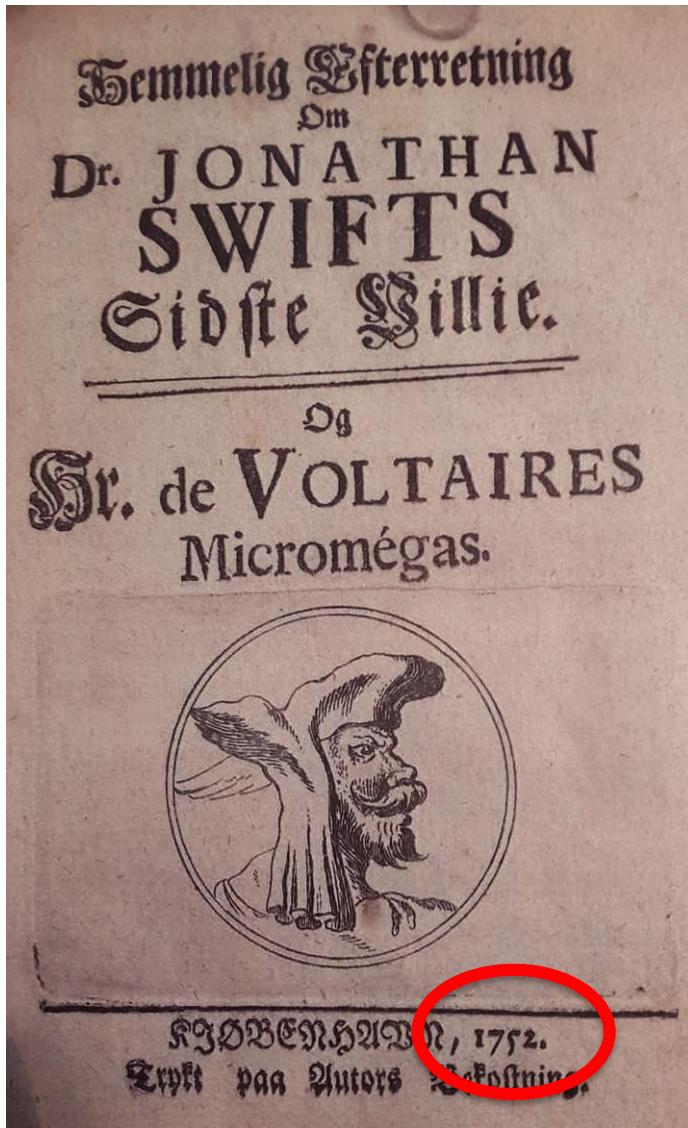

Overall message seemingly similar to Bredal's «how small we are, how utterly minuscule...»

- «Han [Voltaire] søger at bestride de farligste Tilbøyeligheder, som findes hos Menniskene, som ere en fordervet Egenkierlighed, en barenagtig Indbildung, et hovmodigt Sind. Vi ophøye os over alle andre Skabninger, og vi troe, at al Ting, endog de allerlængst fraværende Stierner ere skabte allene for at forlyste os. Vi giøre os til af vor Fornuft, der er sat inden saa snevre Grendser, ligesom vi havde opdaget Naturens forborgneste Hemmeligheder. Vi meene, at vi veed alle Ting, men vi lære her [i Micromégas], at just derved viise vi, at vi ey veed det nødvendigste, som er at kiende os selv.»
- Fosie even quotes Plautus: «Hui! Homunculi, quanti estis!»

Bredal's aspirations

- To become known as a promoter of Enlightenment ideas
- Avoid censorship thanks to Latin language and quasi-anonymity ?
(the poem is signed N.K.B. only)
- Prove his skills in erudition as well as artistry (Latin hexameters and scientific deliberations – ecstasis theory, use of microscope, anatomy of human beings compared to trees, insects etc.)
- Pose as a philosophe and an homme de lettres

Corollaries, 1:

The multilingual & multidisciplinary challenge

- We should stop thinking of Latin texts as backward-looking, sterile imitations of classical models
- We should stop thinking of heroes within our literary canons as representatives of belles lettres alone
- We should start considering the multilingual competence of 18th-cent. intellectuals: fluency in Latin, German, and French was required alongside Danish/Swedish
- Will this be hard ? - YES
- Will this require interdisciplinary approaches ? - INDEED

Corollaries, 2: Latin poetry a vehicle for Enlightenment ideology?

- YES

NIELS KROG BREDAL'S DREAMWORLD

(ONEIPO-ΚΟΣΜΟΣ. Id est Mundus in Somnio, Poëma Philosophico-Heroicum)

Key facts

Published in Københavnske Nye Tidender om Lærde og Curieuse Sager (=Lærde Efterretninger), No. IX, 2 March 1753

6 printed pages = Title with motto + 105 hexameter verses + prose section (1 page) + 14 hexameter verses

Overall structure

Motto: «Woe! Humans! How small we are! How utterly minuscule, if you consider the whole»

Vv. 1-9: Problematizes the widespread (Christian) notion that the entire world and all its living creatures were created for the sake of Man

Vv. 10-19: The hero (1st pers. sg.) of the poem falls into a slumber

Vv. 20-26: An erudite excursion on the concept of ecstasis, i.e. being neither awake nor properly asleep

Vv. 27-33: The hero finds himself in an unknown yet strangely familiar world

Vv. 34-62: The hero becomes increasingly afraid. At first, he grudges being utterly alone; then, a crowd of foreigners shows up; he tries to communicate with them, but, although the foreigners are intelligent beings, they speak a totally different language; the crowd discusses what to do with him, and in the end takes him to their city, where the hero fears that he will become convicted and executed

Vv. 63-68: The hero realizes that his hosts have no evil plans; he begins to learn their language and customs

Vv. 69-79: An excursion regarding religious beliefs. There are two sects: the ‘atheists’ and the ‘erudites’. The latter believe in a Divine Creator, «who bestows rewards upon the just, and punishes villains».

Vv. 80-87: The hero befriends an ‘erudite’ and starts to question him about all kinds of things. A curious phenomenon, a kind of regular, yet smooth, earthquake in the middle of the world is introduced.

Vv. 88-102: Rumours of a kind of volcano inspires the hero to embark upon an expedition. He visits the volcano and witnesses its spuming vapours and ill-boding roars. The inhabitants in the vicinity are constantly afraid that the ground underneath them opens and that they fall into the depths of the earth

Vv. 103-105: The hero is carried by a wind of spuming vapours and returns to his own world

Prose section: Here, the author offers his own interpretation of his dream. He argues that ‘it is obvious’ that he during a state of ecstasis has visited the body of a giant (i.e., a human?), whose body was inhabited by insects (lice or similar). The ‘trees’ he had seen were nothing but hair; the ‘volcano’ the man’s mouth and the ‘spuming vapour’ his breath; the ‘ill-boding roars’ were coughing and sneezing. Finally, he excuses the lack of logic coherence in all details, but such is the nature of dreams, the author argues

Vv. 1-13: Returns to the opening motto and concludes that Homo sapiens is really not much more than an insect; other living creatures, including insects, have souls and feelings, virtues and vices, just like us. And no one can deny that they resemble us in the way they cling to life and fear death, «so why not in other respects as well?», he asks

V. 14: In the concluding verse, the author argues that philosophers should not neglect to investigate carefully what difference, if any, there exists between humans and other living creatures
